A proper name among the ancient Persians; but particularly of one of their kings, called Khusraw Parvēz, (cotemporary with Muhammad), who having been driven from his country by his uncle, took refuge with the Greek emperor Maurice, by whose assistance he defeated the usurper, and recovered his crown. Khusraw, whilst at Maurice's court, married his daughter Irene, who is highly celebrated in the East for her singular beauty, particularly by the famous Persian Nazāmī, in his poem called خسرو شیرین (the loves of Khusraw and Shīrīn), شیرین being the name by which the Persians distinguish Irene, signifying sweet. The throne of this prince is celebrated by many Eastern historians. It is said to have been of such vast extent, that it was supported by 40,000 columns of silver; and that, among other magnificent ornaments, 1,000 globes, suspended in the dome, shewed, by various movements, the motions of the heavenly bodies: 30,000 pieces of embroidered tapestry adorned the walls; and underneath were vaults, containing immense treasures in gold, silver, and precious stones. پرویز فلک The sun.

 P پري parī, Winged. A good genius, a beautiful species of imaginary creature, neither man, woman, angel, nor devil, but answering in many respects to that beneficent little being to whom our ancestors paid so much attention, called the Fairy; which, from the resemblance of the name, and many other circumstances, was in all probability of Eastern extraction. The old romances of Arabia and Persia allot them a particular country called جنستان Jinnistān, where they live upon perfume alone; and conceive them to be so extremely beautiful, that they call a lovely woman پري زاده parī-zādah, born of the Parīs (the name of the second daughter of Darius, whom the Greeks have called Parisatis; corrupting in the same manner sitūrah (a star) into Statira, and rūshan (splendor) into Roxana). The Dēvas, or Dēws, Jinns or Genii, are another species of ideal beings, but the reverse of the Parīs, being ugly, malignant, and perpetually at war with them and with mankind, whom the Parīs are supposed constantly to protect. These two classes of supernatural creatures form great part of the machinery of Eastern poetry, fable, and romance, and give a most fanciful and extended field to luxuriant imaginations. Parī, The sun. ت tā or tē, Is the third letter of the Arabic and Persian alphabets, and denotes 400 in arithmetic. In Arabic, when prefixed, it expresses swearing, the Muhammadans frequently invoking heaven in the following solemn manner; والله بالله و ثم تالله By God! by God! and then by God! In Persian ت (pronounced with a short vowel before it) when found at the end of a noun stands for tō, "thou" (or the genitive case "of thee") as, اسب تو aspat for asp-i tō, Thy horse, and affixed to a verb it represents the oblique case of that pronoun, namely, ترا torā, as میگوید ترا mī gōyad torā, He tells thee. It is also sometimes redundant at the end of a word. Words which in Arabic terminated in t, in Persian are most commonly written with ت, as for همة himmat, they write همت. tā, is commutable with dā.

 أ جنة jannat, A garden, set with trees. A grove of palm-trees. Paradise, heaven. Muhammad knew the genius of his countrymen too well, to suppose that they would be captivated with the idea of mere spiritual enjoyments in the world to come; he therefore declared, that as the body in this life takes so much part in the sufferings of the soul, it should in justice partake of its happiness hereafter, by the most exquisite enjoyment of every corporeal sense. A vulgar notion has prevailed, that the Arabian prophet excludes women from his paradise, but he had too high a regard for the sex to be guilty of so unpolite a piece of injustice: the idea originated from a verse in the Kur'ān, which most certainly allows no place there for old women; this gave so much uneasiness to an ancient dame, that she remonstrated to Muhammad upon the cruelty of the exclusion; when the prophet rendered her immediately perfectly happy, by declaring that all the old women should be restored to the bloom of youth before they entered those mansions of bliss. The Muhammadans believe that there exist eight heavens, or different degrees of felicity, for the blessed; and seven hells, or degrees of torment, for the damned; drawing from thence an inference, that the mercy of God surpasses his justice. jannatu'l-ma'wa', The fourth heaven formed of gold. jannatu'l-bilād, The paradise of regions; title of Bengal. jannat-i-ʿadan, The garden of Eden. The Muhammadans assign three places for this terrestrial paradise: the first, near Damascus in Syria; the second, towards Obollah in the Arabian Irāk or Chaldea; and the third, on a spot bordering upon the desert of Noubandijān in Persia, called Sheb Buvān, watered by the Nīlāb; while others fix it at Samarkand. The more ancient traditions however place it in the island of Sarandīb or Ceylon, where they say Adam was interred; agreeable to which opinion the Portuguese have named the mountain, where they pretend to point out the grotto and sepulchre of the father of mankind, Pico d'Adam. jannat-makūn (or jannat-āshiyūnī), Placed in paradise (a mode of speaking of deceased princes). ahālī-i-jannat, The inhabitants of paradise. butnūnū'l-jannat, The middle of paradise. jannat-kash, Obedience. jannat-nasīb shudan, To die.
